

The 20 Minute Email

The customer is not always right.

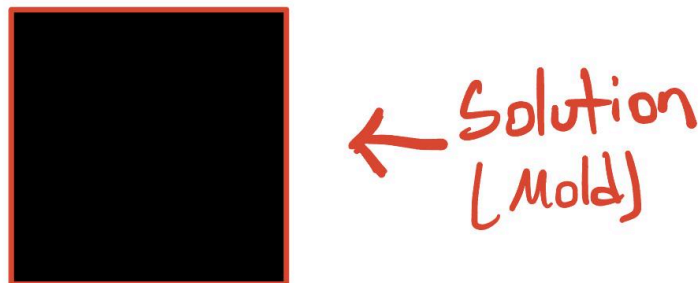

This is not true for all markets. If you sell commodities like coffee then you have to pay attention to what's trending.

But coaching and consulting are not commodities. They're luxury goods. And luxury goods must be sold differently:

The shape here represents the prospect.

The mold represents a solution you can provide.

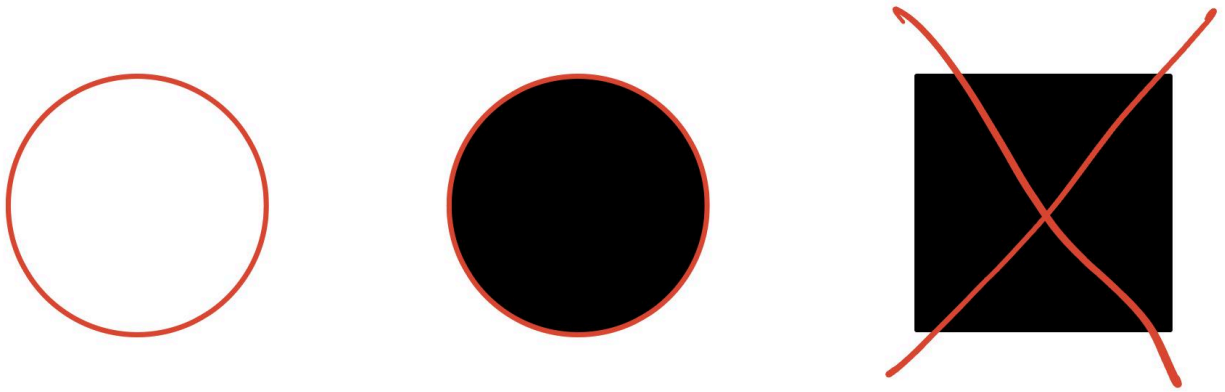

Let's say a prospect needs a square-shaped solution. Writing an email with them in mind would make sense.

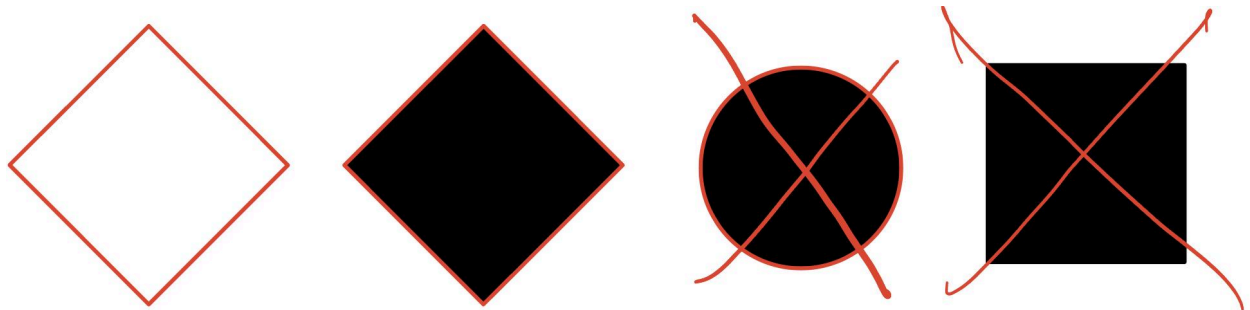

But let's say then you find a prospect who needs a circle-shaped solution.

If we assume the prospect is always right then we must trade the square solution and market a circular one.

But say you find someone who needs a rhombus. You'd have to trade the other two solutions and market a new one.

And so on and so on...

Fitting your solution to the prospect means you're always on the back foot. Reacting.

It's exhausting because you're not a mind reader. You would second-guess yourself constantly because you'd be thinking "Am I doing this right?"

Person A needs one solution. Person B needs another one.

They would both make equally good clients. But tailoring to one means you would have to trade the other one.

It's easier to start from the opposite end:

Not by tailoring your solutions to the prospect. But by showing your solutions and letting prospects fit themselves to you.

I have this nicotine spray I use to relax. Others use that same spray to quit smoking. Others to create habits.

Imagine they marketed to “Entrepreneurs who run workshops.” They’d go bankrupt tomorrow.

They know people buy for many reasons. And that they can’t guess which one. So they don’t bother trying and just market the solution instead.

People join Cash Creators for different reasons:

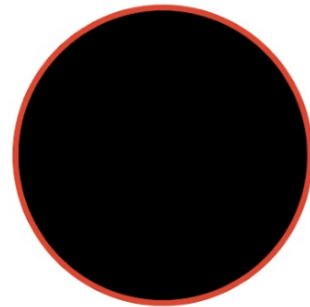

Some want more clients.

Some want better margins.

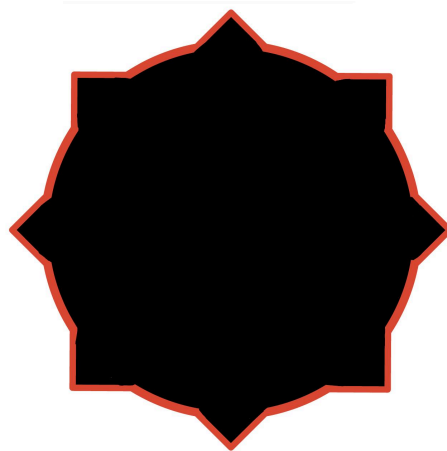

Others want speed.

Like the nicotine company, I can’t guess which is which. It’s not my call.

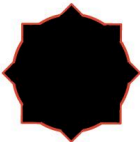

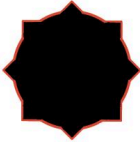

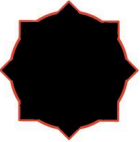

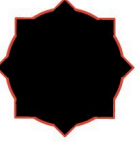

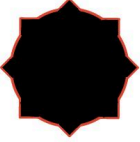

But what I can do is show my solutions so that prospects see the one they want in me.

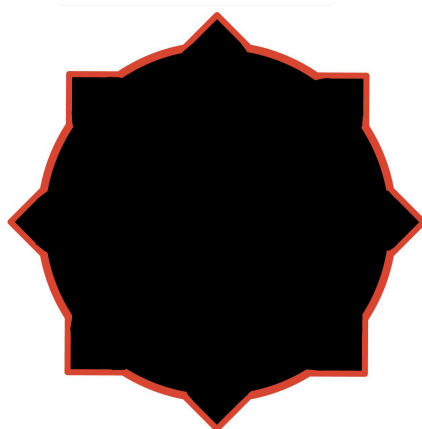

Thinking about solutions first eliminates the need to always come up with something new:

Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday	Sunday

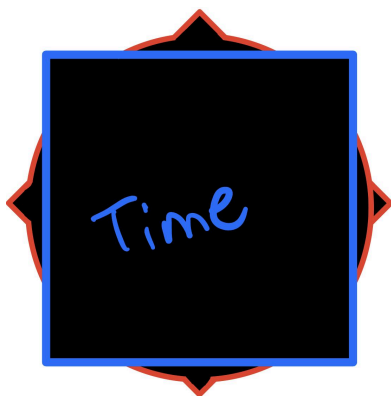

You can just talk about one of your many solutions. Whichever you feel like talking about that day. And let the prospects fit themselves to them.

Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday	Sunday

Below you'll find 3 emails that got clients. Pay attention to how I'm talking about the same thing (Cash Creators).

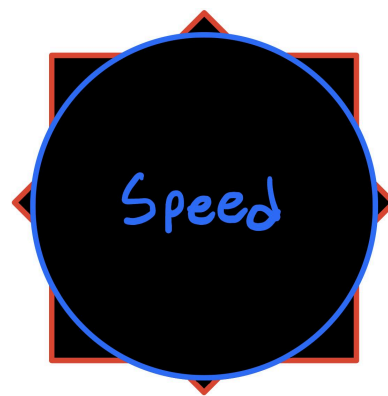

But notice how the specific solution I felt like talking about that day appealed to different prospects:

The 41 Minute Workday

[The Model With 95.4% Profit
Margins](#)

I Did Very Little

You have more than one solution. And that's partly why I don't recommend calling yourself a coach:

By thinking of yourself not as a coach or consultant or mentor,

But simply as someone with many solutions,

You make marketing easier because you just have to show them and let the prospects fit themselves to you.

Small Stories Beat Big Stories

Showing your solutions is easier when you lower your standards of what you consider marketing-worthy.

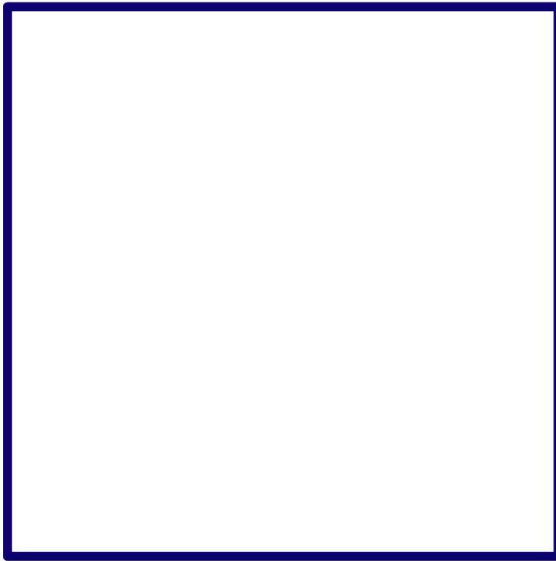

Titanic is about a Big Story: The Titanic sinking.

But it wouldn't mean anything without the Small Stories:

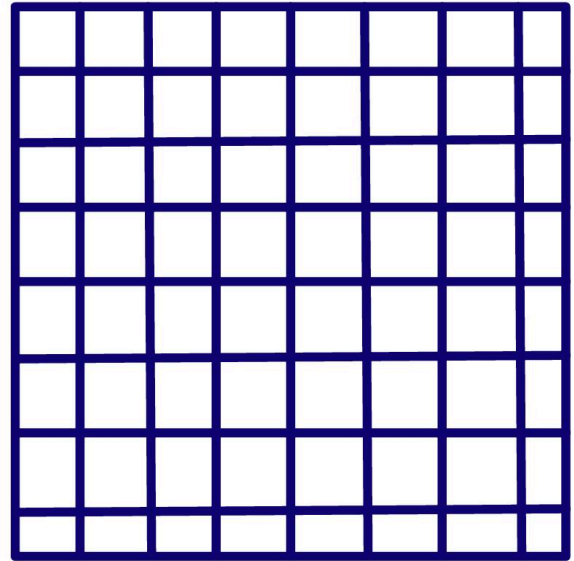

- Jack painting Rose.
- "I'm the king of the world!".
- Freezing in the sea.
- When the violinists kept playing even though the ship was sinking.

Your bottleneck to writing a 20 Minute Email isn't your ability to write.

It's your ability to collect the Small Stories you already have:

This is marketing-worthy.

And so are these.

Great content isn't created. It's collected. You don't need to do more interesting things. You just need to talk about yourself in a more interesting way.

See yourself as a carpenter. You're working on a wooden table. And you're creating sawdust as you go.

We think that the marketing should be about the table (the result). When in reality it should be about the sawdust (the work).

Example: My table, or main work, is the path to $100,000/month profit. I can only talk about that so many times before it gets stale. And I'll only hit it once.

However, my best performing emails are often about the sawdust that was created from that work.

- The 41 Minute Workday
- 90 Days Of Offers
- Instagram vs. X

We don't need to 'create' any Sawdust Content because it's already done. We just have to collect it.

So let's collect it. And then we'll turn it into 20 Minute Emails that sell.

50 Pieces Of Sawdust

These are designed to extract the Small Stories from you.

Take 20 seconds to answer them in 1 sentence in a notes file. I call mine Sawdust Notes.

Quality is not a requirement. It has to be fast and raw.

For time constraints, we'll do few.

- Turn yourself into good headlines.
- Turn yourself into bad headlines.
- What's one problem you solved this week?
- How did you solve it?
- What's one problem you're solving today?
- How will you solve it?
- Why do you know it will work?
- When it fails - why does it fail?
- When it works - why does it work?
- What's a small outcome you helped a client achieve?
- What's a big outcome you helped a client achieve?
- What's 1 question your clients have asked you more than once?
- What's a small interaction you remember with a client?
- What piece of content has got you clients?
- What content have you thought about creating but haven't got around to it?
- What piece of work has someone reflected back at you?
- What's an interesting statistic?
- What's 1 thing you helped a client with recently?
- Which part of what you do do you enjoy the most?
- What 1 piece of content has performed well?
- What's 1 client win you can think about?
- What 1 thing someone has praised you on?
- Which kind of content used to work well that you stopped making?
- What assets could be templatized? (Sheets, Templates...)
- What sub-asset could be templatized? (Sub-parts of that asset)
- Which small outcome did you achieve recently?
- Today?
- Last month?
- Which tactics did not work for you?
- Which tactics did?
- What work can you put on a Swipe File? (Guides, Templates, Content)
- What are your clients overthinking?
- What could you record? (Interviews, Podcast)
- What work is already done? (PDF's, Illustrations, Recordings)

- Who could you collab with? (Podcast, Workshop)
- What does your newer audience not know about you?
- What did you do on your best month?
- Which of your assets did you use this week?
- What terms have you come up with?
- Which client had a good outcome?
- Which conversation can you screenshot?
- Which big story has smaller stories?
- What have you learned from your favorite clients?
- What have you learned from your least favorite client?
- What's one thing you disagree with the market on?
- What evidence can you provide that you're good at what you do?
- What were you wrong about?
- What are your clients doing that they shouldn't?
- What are your clients not doing but they should?
- What won't change anything?
- Which low hanging fruit can your clients take advantage of?
- What have your clients verbally told you that was valuable?
- Which metric are your clients paying attention to that they shouldn't?
- Which metrics are your clients not paying attention to that they should?
- What's your Code?
- What's your Goal?
- What's the update on that goal?
- What's one of your clients' liabilities that could be turned into an asset?
- What sneak peek can you give of what you're working on?
- Which 2 things you've already worked on could you sell together?
- Check your calendar. What did you talk about on your calls?

Add more if you'd like.

Writing

Writing is a complicated thing for me to explain because I'm very logical. Art is emotional. It's based on color rather than lines.

There's a common theme among artists: They claim that it's not them who create the art. They're just conduits from ideas that seem to arise from a divine source.

It sounds woo-woo but you've felt it. Your best creation just "happens". There was something about that moment that allowed the content to flow. You tapped into the divine source. And you probably got a pretty good amount of sales or engagement from it.

Below is my way to connect into that divine source.

This is personal to everybody. I'll show you how I do it and you pick up the nuance.

1. Put ideas and stories in the Sawdust Notes.

Your best insights are revealed during the work. Like The 41 Minute Workday. I can't "plan" that. It has to come during the work. Put any idea and insight you get into the Sawdust Note. Raw. Anytime. And make it a habit. It's supposed to be messy because if you overengineer this it's hard to make it a habit.

2. Read the Notes.

I look at these notes before I check notifications. Sometimes I really don't feel like it. But this is when I think "It's just 20 minutes. How bad can it be?"

3. Ask yourself: "Which idea shines brighter?"

Don't write about things you don't want to write about. That's a disservice to the reader and to you. Read your Sawdust Note, however raw, and find which idea shines brighter. The best idea will be the one that feels "easiest" at that time.

4. Tell the story.

"Marketing beyond conveying information is insecurity." - Nassim Taleb. Tell the story of what happened. And be honest. Use numbers where you would use adjectives and nuance where you would use absolutes.

Don't say "The most important thing I learned is..."

Say "When I didn't know this, I was 25 pounds heavier."

Don't say "supercharge your leadflow".

Say "Get 1 new lead every day."

5. Share the insight.

The story will reveal an insight. Just keep writing. Don't edit. Lower your expectations of what's acceptable so you can get everything on the page. Refine it later.

6. Offer Service

Never ask for a purchase. Instead, offer service. Pushing people to a purchase feels manipulative to make and to read. Offering service is honest and is seen as a favor rather than an ask. If you can find a natural transition, position it as the natural next step. If there's no natural transition, you can make it easier by placing it in the P.S.

See it in practice.

The 20 Minute Email Checklist

When editing, this is roughly what I look for:

1. Is it about 1 thing?
2. Have I removed information that doesn't add to the 1 thing?
3. Have I given insight, not value? (Show the answer. But don't walk them through it).
4. Am I being honest?
5. What's the natural next step?

See it in practice.

Should You Do Daily?

On emails, quantity beats quality. Say you send 7 emails. Your ideal client will only read 3 of them. That's still 300% more exposure than a weekly newsletter (which they may not read). People who send a weekly newsletter can 3-7x their business by just writing it daily.

But consistency beats quantity. If you can't do a daily email, commit to something else. But commit. Once a week for a year is better than daily for a month.

Where To Go From Here

For 90 swipeable emails, 90 Days Of Offers.

If you have an unresponsive audience, The Workshop Funnel.

If your audience responds but doesn't buy, Audience Respect.